Brooklyn, NY, February 1st, 2015 – ART 3 is pleased to announce the exhibition BREAK GROUND, with works by four artists who have each developed a personal approach to painting as a structural geometry, and with it the potential for exploring both two and three-dimensional space. Employing paint and formats that can be considered traditional, these artists have developed devices and vocabularies, including geometric, textual, architectonic and illusionary, that suggest an evolving, elusive subject matter and content in their work. The concept of breaking ground refers to both the conceptual and physical aspects of their endeavors.

ART 3 has conceived this exhibition as a dialogue between the paired artists, an opportunity for the viewer to explore the connections and variations in their approaches to image making, composition, and execution. In the conversation or dialogue between Joe Arnheim and Marjorie Welsh, there is a back and forth between Arnheim's layered and often elusive, multi-lingual text and sculptural assemblage, and Welsh's grids, that disturb the structural order of things through dislocation, reversal, magnification, condensation, breaks, or foregrounding. Both artists are immersed in a process of layering, with materials and image, to suggest an elusory space that is in motion and transition. In Arnheim's hand-painted text, the translucent layering and language variety makes comprehending his work that much more of a challenge. Both engage the viewer to read, interpret or translate their work, while offering a conceptual clarity that reduces any necessity of solving or interpreting the image as something of a non sequitur.

With the paintings of Richard Schur and Judith Seligson, there is an underlying geometric, floor-plan structure that is evolving, and at the same time, having an overall functional clarity. The exploratory methods of these paired artists includes both color and light, often with unexpected, for the viewer, results. The dialogue comes with the method with which they define or delineate space. Schur employs layering, bright, luminous color to maintain an overall sense of the grid in flux or transition. Seligson uses the suggestion of transparency and the diagonal line or shadow to suggest a space or architecture either emerging or hovering just below the surface. The conversation between these two artist's geometric formats is reminiscent of the theoretical counterpoint between Mondrian and Theo van Doesburg, specifically the use of the horizontal and/or the diagonal in painted space.

The work of these four painters once again engages textual abstraction or takes up the challenge of geometric abstraction, and the still immersive focus within the discipline of painting in contemporary art. It also confirms that there are, and continue to be, issues in painting that keep it vital and timely within the artistic dialogue of the early 21st century.
